BACK TO THE FUTURE

WHEN THE INTERIOR INSTALLATION VISIONA OPENED TO THE PUBLIC
ON A RIVERBOAT ON THE RHINE DURING THE COLOGNE
FURNITURE FAIR IN 1968, VISITORS WERE OVERWHELMED BY THE VISCERAL SPECTACLE PRESENTED TO THEM.

Designed by Danish artist and architect Verner Panton for chemical corporation Bayer it wasn't just a visual experience, but it also played with scents and sounds to full psychedelic effect. Each room on the boat was colour co-ordinated and the sensual shapes and plush textures clearly broke with the Danish tradition of blonde wood and natural materials that Panton was trained in.

This ground-breaking treatment of the interior as an art form lives on through photographs in the annals of design history, there was even an exhibition dedicated to it at the Vitra Design Museum in 2014, but certain elements have been lifted from this historical context and have had a life of their own. The Flower Pot lamp is such a design. Created through the interplay of two half spheres in spun metal and powder-coated in bright colours, it was an ultimate icon of 1960s pop culture. But the light has proved to have longevity/impact beyond its origins and today it's one of &tradition's flagship products.

For a young company, founded in 2010, &tradition has a significant roster of influential Danish 20th century designers. Beside Panton, we count Danish modernists Arne Jacobsen and Flemming Lassen and Sydney opera house architect Jørn Utzon to our stable. They are designers that helped shape 20th century design culture and their legacy now live on through the incredibly avant garde products they created. Some of them are part of the &tradition catalogue, such as the JU1 pendant by Utzon and the Mayor sofa by Lassen and Jacobsen and the Bellevue lamps by Jacobsen.

While these designers have an undisputed reputation as Danish design history's heavy-weights the creative tension inherent to &tradition's practice lies in the fact that we also give space to contemporary designers that help define future classics. For this we look beyond the Scandinavian design tradition and towards the practitioners that help influence the design climate of today.

Here Spanish designer Jaime Hayon and Italian Luca Nichetto, as well as Danish architecture practice Space Copenhagen can be counted among the most significant names. Just like Jacobsen, Utzon and Panton created some very important spaces, emblematic of 20th century design, so does Hayon, Nichetto and Space Copenhagen in the 21st.

The experimental restaurant Noma in Copenhagen was designed by Space Copenhagen and Hayon broke with 1990s minimalism when he presented his interiors for Bisazza for the Milan Furniture Fair in 2006.

The biggest difference for &tradition is that with these designers there is scope for dialogue and together the designers and &tradition develop the products that will be future classics such as Hayon's Catch chair or Space Copenhagen's Fly sofa and armchair. Like Nichetto says "I make things with my DNA, and with the DNA of the company – and the best results come when there is 50% of each.”

While the impact of these designers can’t be denied, an important factor of &tradition’s success is to simultaneously serve as a platform for up-and-coming designers – to work with the not-yet world famous in order to create the future design stars of tomorrow. It’s a break that is crucial for many practitioners, where getting a piece into production can help kick-start a whole career.

It is often in the meeting with these designers that innovation and experimentation is lifted to the fore. As in the case of Swedish studio vit’s Marble Light – how do you make something as solid as marble and something as light as blown glass fit together in a commercially viable product? Or in the case of Lex Pott – how can you serially produce metal vases that change colour according to natural processes? As a brand we are able to experiment and develop these designs together with their inventors and like Nichetto says, reach the best results possible through a true collaboration.

What really sets &tradition apart is that there is a real kinship between the old masters who were avant-garde in their time and contemporary designers, creating the ground-breaking icons of tomorrow. At &tradition it’s about the yet undefined, what’s yet to come. It’s about what comes before the ampersand, rather than after.

TRUE COLOURS

BY LEX POTT
2015

“WHAT ATTRACTS ME TO NATURAL MATERIALS IS THEIR RICH HISTORY,” SAYS DESIGNER LEX POTT. “WOOD, STONE AND METAL HAVE BEEN USED FOR CENTURIES, BUT WHILE TECHNOLOGY IS CHANGING AND CULTURE IS CHANGING, THESE MATERIALS ARE NOT.”

The Amsterdam-based designer, who graduated from Design Academy Eindhoven in 2009, takes natural materials as his starting point and turns them into contemporary products. Unlike most designers, Pott never sketches at any stage of the process. “I am really a maker,” he says. “If I have an idea I prefer to make it to figure out how I would like it to be.”

Often Pott starts on a project without knowing what the end result will be. Diptych, for example, zooms in on one particular Douglas Fir tree and explores how seasonal weather changes affect the tree’s colouring and annual rings. It resulted in a number of different objects, from a set of matches to a cabinet and a room divider, that were only discovered during the process itself. “What’s interesting about natural materials is that they aren’t on trend so they don’t run out of fashion,” he says. “They stay interesting much longer than a fashionable material.”

Some of Pott’s processes never reach a practical outcome at all. As such, Pott is part of a generation of designers who comfortably bridge the gap between designer and artist. He can find himself working for a fashion brand one day, only to develop a design object or exhibit at an art gallery the next. “The reason I became a designer is that my parents are artists, he explains.

“I decided I wanted to be in the creative industry, but to work with things that have a function. But sometimes because my process is intuitive and experimental, the result isn’t a practical object, but a decorative piece or a sculpture.”

Lately, Pott’s process-led research has led him towards the chemistry of colour. “When you look at the old roofs of churches, they become green over time as they oxidise, while steel always becomes brown. What’s interesting is that even when people see the green, they also know there is a different colour underneath. So the green says something more. It tells a story about time and its own creation too”.

Pott’s investigation into the colours that materials produce naturally as they react to their environment resulted in the True Colour vases for &tradition. “It seemed like a limited palette at first,” he says. “And I tried a lot of colours that didn’t work. But the more I got into it, the more I saw different options. For example, two colours can mix, like pigments, into others. So looking forward I’d like to find out more about how colours physically mix and how they can be deconstructed, with light for example.” And so the experimentation which is a signature of Pott’s practice continues.

CLOUD SOFA

BY LUCA NICHETTO
2015

WHEN SUMMING UP HIS PRACTICE LUCA NICHETTO PREFERS TO QUOTE LEGENDARY ITALIAN DESIGNER VICO MAGISTRETTI:

“THE DESIGNER IS THE FATHER OF THE PRODUCT AND THE COMPANY IS THE MOTHER.”

It's a formula that Nichetto follows closely. “I like to think that to be a designer is not to be an artist, it is about finding a balance between my vision and the vision of the brand that I am working with,” he says. “I make things with my DNA and with the DNA of the company. The best results come when there is 50 per cent of each.”

So far, this approach has served Nichetto well. Born in Venice, on Murano, he roamed the island's famous glass factories as a child and stayed on in the city to study Art and Industrial Design at the University Institute of Architecture of Venice. He opened his own design studio, Nichetto & Partners, in 2006.

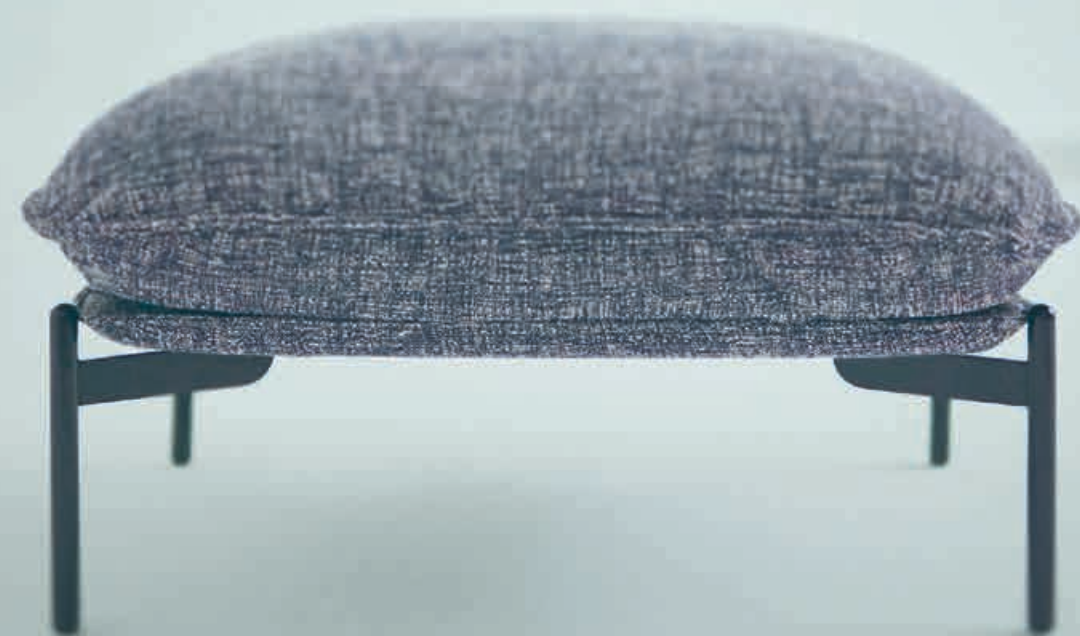

Still a few years shy of 40, Nichetto is one of the most successful designers of his generation. He has studios in both Venice and Stockholm, and has collaborated with brands that span from legendary Italian manufacturers to innovative up-and-coming Scandinavian companies, &tradition amongst them.

From small tabletop pieces, furniture and textiles to large architectural spaces; from the very traditional to the contemporary; from wood, brass, eco-felt and paper to glass, concrete and silicone; the work of Nichetto brings epithets such as varied, expansive and multidisciplinary to mind.

When asked to pinpoint the highlights of his working life so far, Nichetto mentions projects such as the glass vases he was commissioned to make for a family-run business in Murano in 2000, and which gave him his first break in design; and The Tales Pavilion in Beijing from 2013, which was the first time he worked on an architectural project. Typical of a designer whose practice is defined by searching for the new and unexplored, both projects represented firsts.

Since 2011, Nichetto has divided his time between Italy and Sweden, challenging him to explore a new design culture. It is a change to which he has responded well. In a project like the Cloud sofa for &tradition, both his native and adopted design cultures can be detected, perfectly summing up Nichetto at this point in his career.

This idea of mixing and sharing is the core of Nichetto's DNA as a designer. In recent years he has collaborated more and more, embarking on projects with, for example, Japanese designer Oki Sato and Russian fashion designer Yulia Yadryshnikova. “For me, as a creative person, I think the future is in sharing,” says Nichetto. “It's in being open and listening to other people with another experience and creating a network. I believe in the network, in collaboration, I think it is much more powerful than being alone.”

LIGHT FOREST

BY ONTWERPDUO
2015

IN THE HANDS OF DUTCH DESIGNERS ONTWERPDUO
THE WHIMSY OF FAIRYTALES IS COMBINED WITH THE FUNCTIONAL WORLD OF FURNITURE DESIGN.

The Eindhoven-based studio was set up by Tineke Beunders and Nathan Wierink in 2008 after they graduated from Design Academy Eindhoven. Since then, they have created furniture such as Marbelous, a wooden table with fully functioning kugelbahns or marble runs in place of conventional table legs; Birdcage, a dangling armchair hung from the ceiling for humans to nest in; and now Light Forest, a series of lights that crawl across walls and ceilings for &tradition.

Based in the same abandoned Philips factory as famous Dutch designer Piet Hein Eek, Ontwerpdue follows in the footsteps of conceptual practices such as Studio Job and Kiki van Eijk, who also emerged from the city's vibrant creative scene.

It is Beunders who ignites Ontwerpdue's projects. She has never let go of her childhood obsession with secret worlds only accessible by children, and lets this fantasy run wild in her creative process. Beunders imagines an object that could be, rather than one that already exists.

"As all children, we both lived with the idea that anything can be a toy, something to play with, and that all objects can be something else than what they look like to a grown up," explains Wierink. "That meeting between the real and the unreal is very important for us as designers."

Once a basic idea is in place, Wierink takes over the development of the product. In the Ontwerpdue workshop – a laboratory-like environment with modular storage on wheels that allows for projects of many different scales – he experiments with Beunders's fantasy objects until they are not just feasible, but also fill a practical purpose.

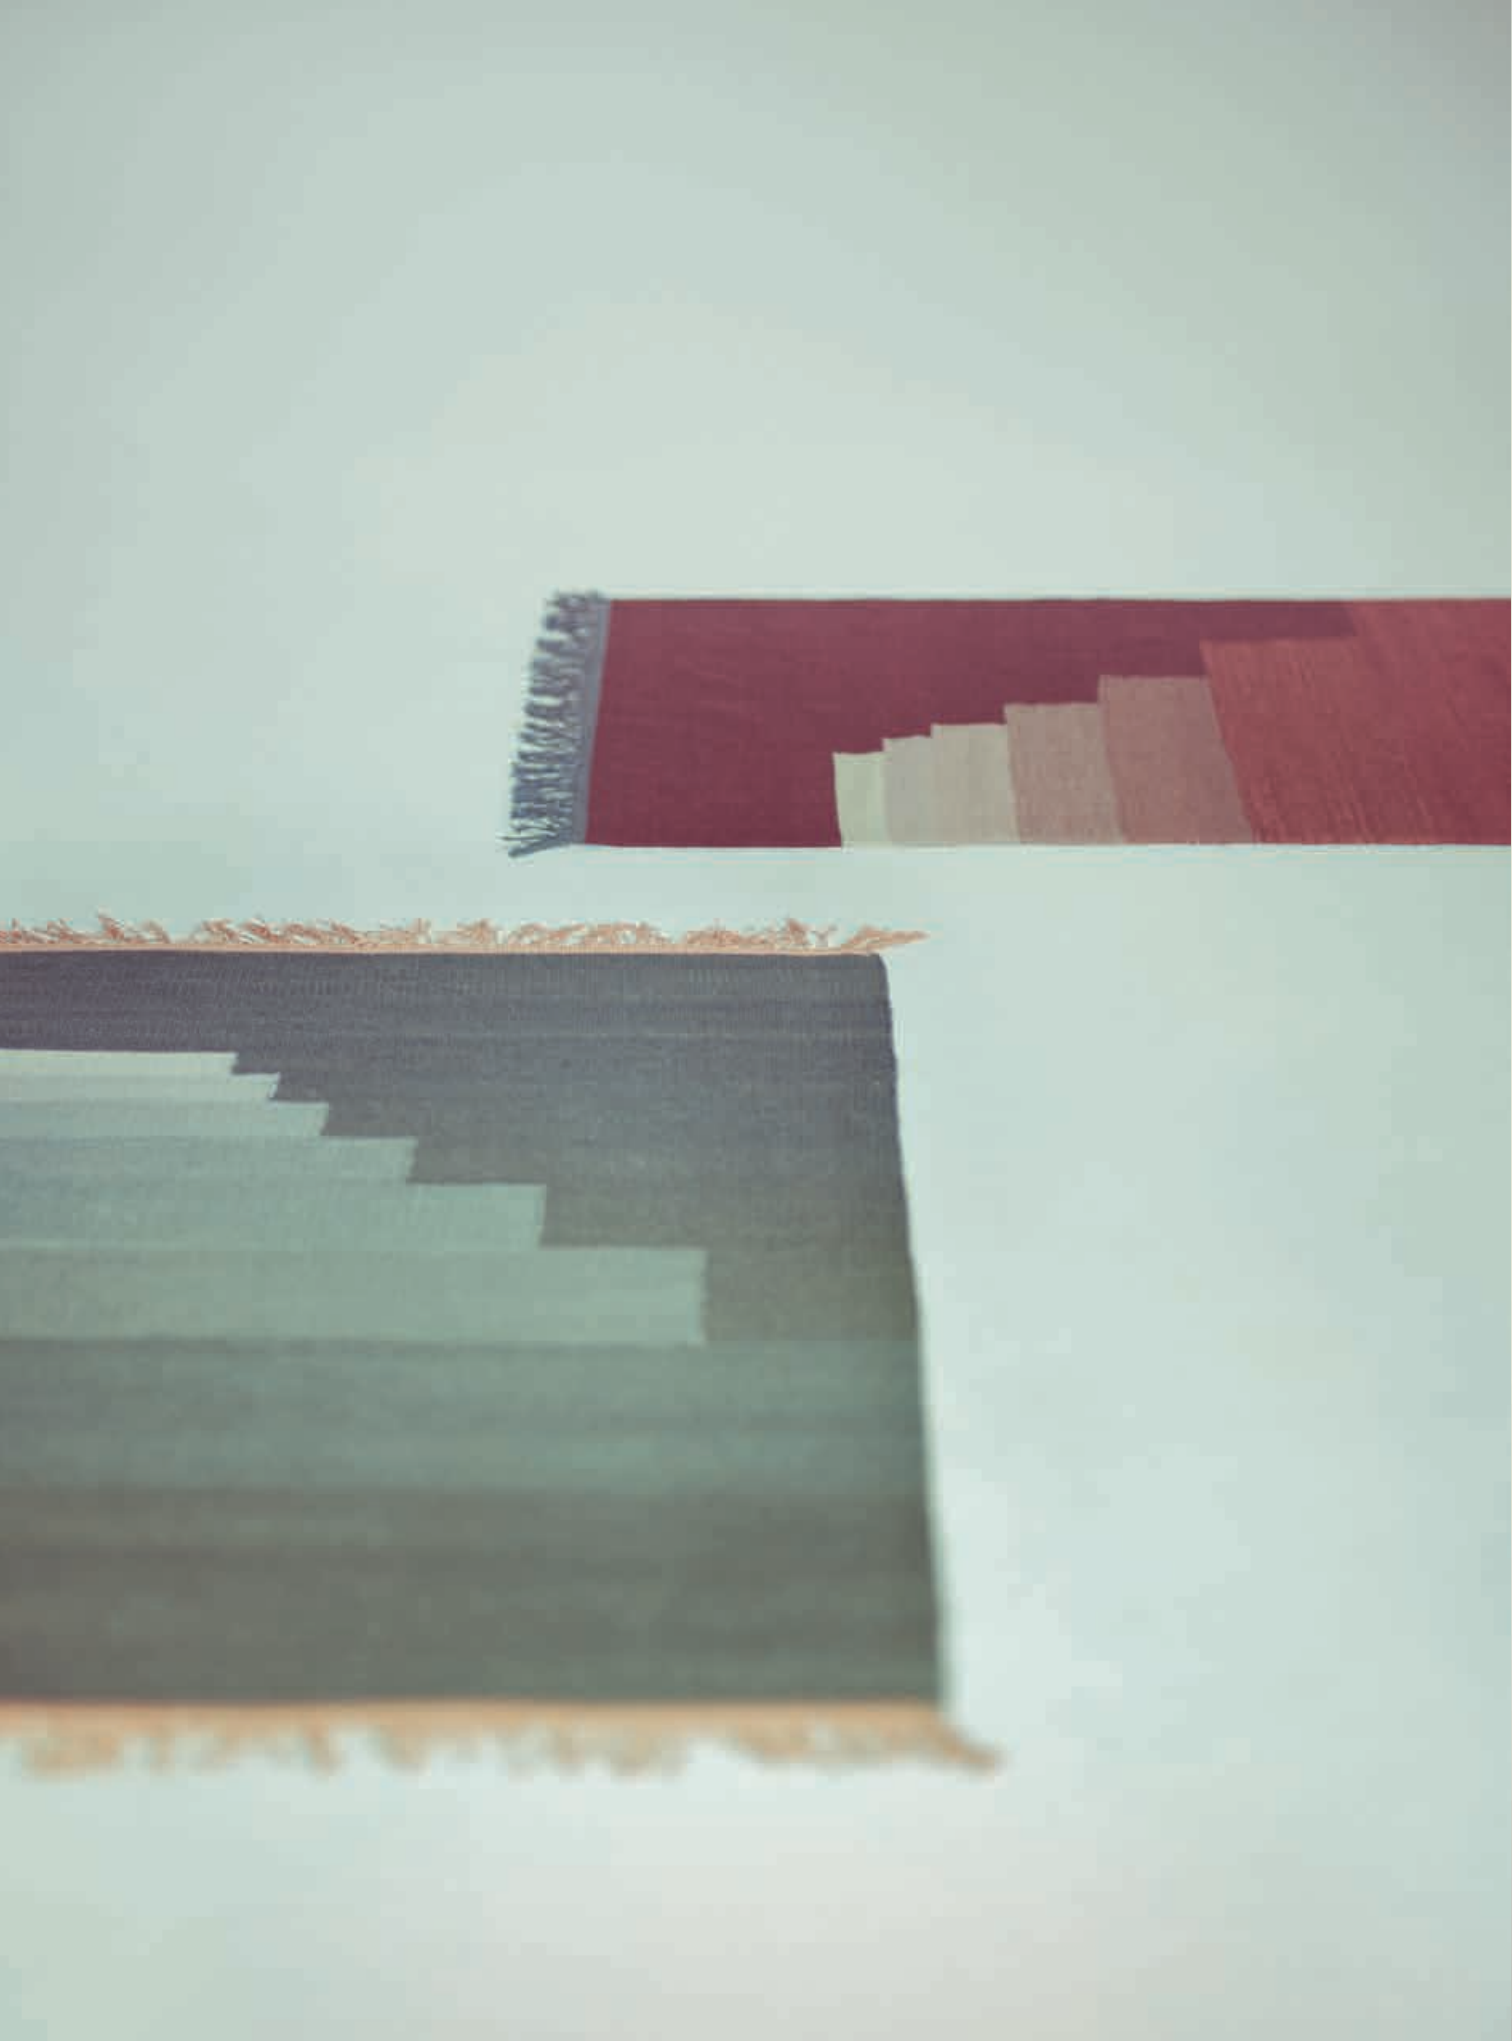

This means that even a piece such as What It Is It Isn't, a mind-bending, swaying cabinet inspired by the warped visions of Alice in Wonderland, offers its owner perfectly adequate storage space. But while some of the pieces may seem whimsical, a product like Light Forest also poses a clever solution to the ever-occurring problem of electrical points not being found in convenient places. "It is poetic and functional at the same time," says Beunders, perfectly reflecting the studio's philosophy.

Despite its industrial aesthetic (the "branches" are made from extruded aluminium tubes), Light Forest was originally inspired by the peace and stillness found in the old forests of Europe. "We have cycled all over Europe, to the Sahara-like deserts of inland Spain and to the parts of the Schwarzwald that are like rain-forests," says Wierink. "If you venture off the beaten track, you can spend a lot of time without seeing other people. It gives you perspective. It is like being in a fairytale."

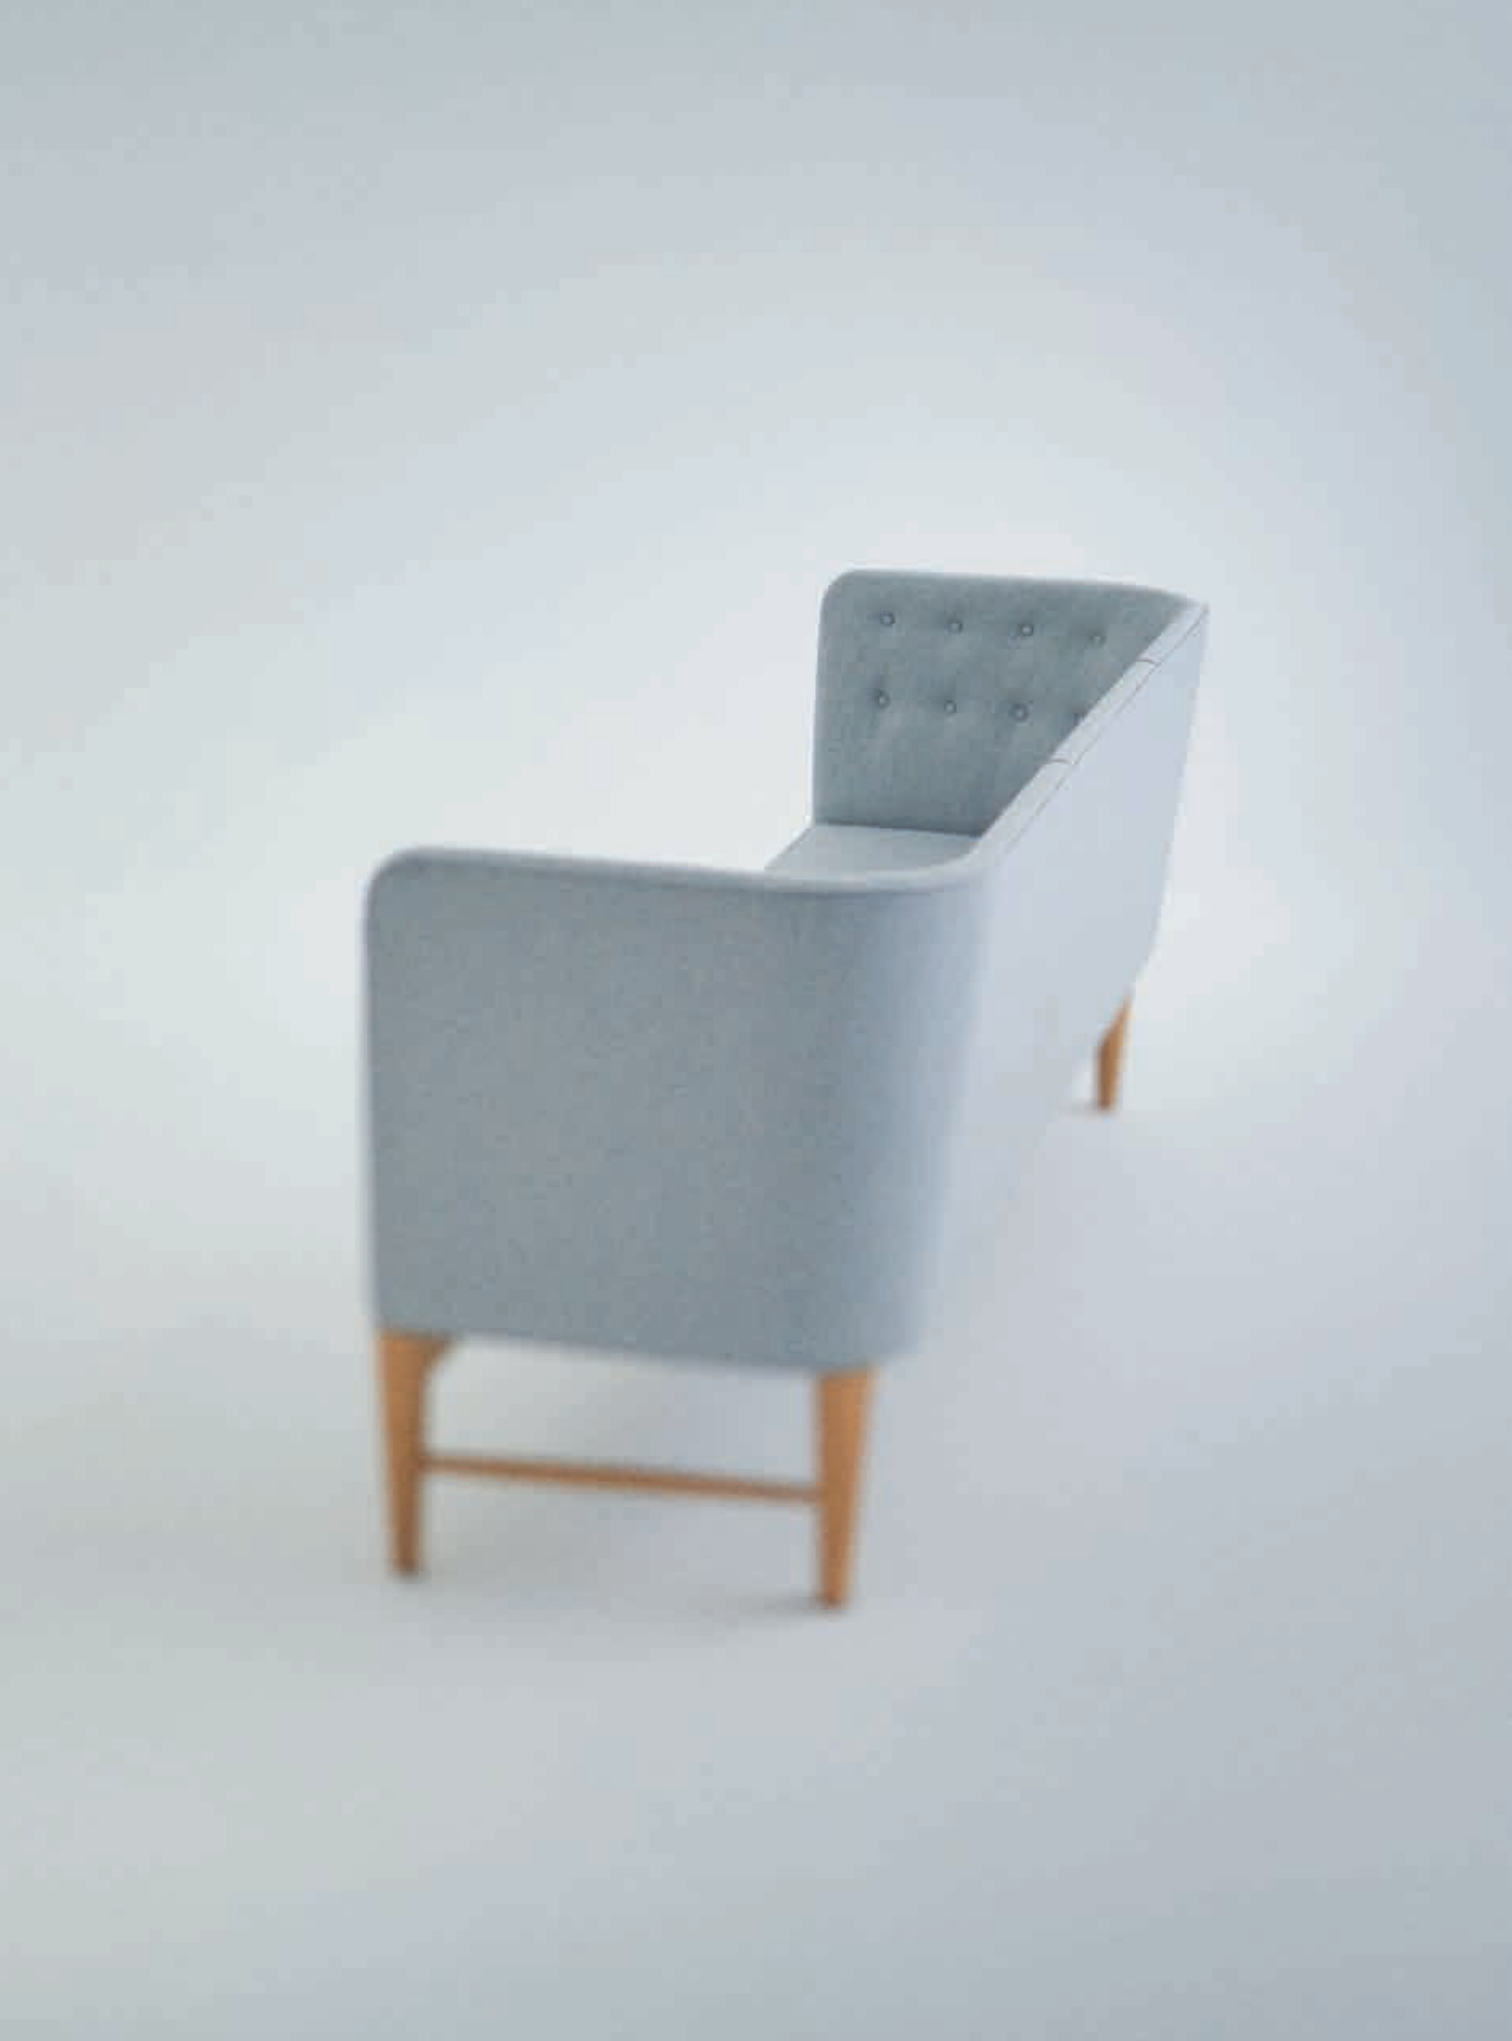

HOW WE PRODUCE

WE CHALLENGE CONVENTION TO CREATE OBJECTS THAT RETHINK HOW WE USE MATERIALS AND MANUFACTURING TECHNIQUES.

WE FIND BEAUTY IN OBJECTS THAT CAN BE CREATED BY THE LATEST INDUSTRIAL PROCESSES AS WELL AS THOSE THAT MAINTAIN TECHNIQUES THAT HAVE EVOLVED OVER A LONG TIME.
